In no other port in the world, with the exception perhaps of Singapore, is shipping so lightly taxed as in Hongkong. In no other port in the world has the growth of the shipping trade been so remarkable. The geographical position of the island is no doubt the prime factor in attracting trade, but the cheapness of the port has also had much to do with it. There is a good deal of up person might break his leg. The sooner it trade at present passing through our harbour which would be diverted by the imposition of very little further taxation. At present a vessel can afford to call here either to land or take in almost insignificant amount of cargo, and it is to the interest of the Colony to do all in its power to attract shipping, for every vessel that enters the port puts money in circulation and contributes to our general boat, but wet. The rates of my and allowances for the and only a small population for whose not before been beaten by a coasting sailing subadars and jemadars of the Mauritins companconsumption goods must be brought, and that there is any population at all is due solely to the fact that vessels find it convenient to call here. In our case shipping does not follow the population; it is the ment of the harbour and the maintenance of low taxation on vessels entoring is of prime importance. It was in this view, apparently, that the Hon. T. H. When my Aunt Dorcas died and left me five hundred a year and a furnished house in Chelsea I felt that life had nothing left to offer except immediate possession of the legacy. Even Mildred Maybew, whom I had hitherto regarded as my life's light, became less lumilodged with her mother and I sang duets with Mildred and gave her gloves when it would run to it, which was soldom. She was a dear, good girl, and I meant to marry her some day. It is very nice to feel that a good little woman
